Dear Participants,

As a UC researcher interested in this work, I'm very encouraged at 1) the equity considerations, particularly the insistence that policy interventions make real, not token, differences for a labor transition and 2) the insistence on implementable policy recommendations, i.e., maybe not down to legislative text (though, why not?), but close. Regarding policy interventions that make real differences, is the state open to considering policy interventions that are as ambitious as those implemented during the New Deal?
